19. Read the following case and answer the questions that follow:

Small Heven, a Nepal-based multinational tourism company, partnered with the French travel agency Éclat Voyages to design premium tour packages for European tourists visiting Nepal. Despite the potential for success, the collaboration faced serious challenges due to intercultural communication gaps. The French team's direct communication style clashed with the Nepalese team's preference for indirect and polite expressions. This led to misunderstandings, as the French perceived the Nepalese as indecisive, while the Nepalese felt the French were overly assertive. Language barriers also played a role, as both teams communicated in English, leading to differing interpretations of key terms like "flexible itinerary."

Cultural differences in time management further strained the partnership. The Nepalese team's flexible deadline approach conflicted with the French team's strict schedule adherence, causing delays and frustration. Non-verbal communication issues added to the problems. For instance, the Nepalese team avoided direct eye contact as a sign of respect, which the French team misinterpreted as disinterest. Additionally, decision-making styles differed: while Éclat Voyages relied on hierarchical decision-making, Bright Horizons followed a consensus-driven approach, delaying the finalization of plans.

The consequences of these intercultural communication issues were significant. The launch of the tour packages was delayed by three months, causing both teams to miss the peak European travel season. This not only resulted in financial losses for Bright Horizons but also strained its relationship with Éclat Voyages. The French agency, frustrated by the inefficiencies, began reconsidering its future collaboration with the Nepalese company, highlighting the importance of bridging cultural differences for successful international partnerships.

Questions:

- a. Introduce the problem in the given case.
- b. Based on the given case, explain three barriers to intercultural communication.
- c. If you were to visit a new country for business purposes, how would you prepare yourself for effective communication across your culture?
